Been There, Done What?

Our manual of choice for the world traveler. It teaches how to do a one year world trip, and how to use this as a platform for establishing an international lifestyle. The book has six parts: How to overcome your fears, how to plan and prepare for a world trip, psychological and cultural challenges associated with an international lifestyle, risk prevention, daily arrangement of life on the road, and romance, adventure, and other joys. Written by Roland Watson, currently somewhere in Papua New Guinea. $12.00 Find it at:

A couple of issues ago we ran a travel tip about taking a 100 watt light bulb with you to better illuminate a dim room. Diana Matthiesen sets us straight:

In one of your travel tips, you suggested carrying a 100W bulb when traveling. On the surface this sounds like good advice, but it could be dangerous. The assumption being made here is that the reason the hotel has used is low wattage bulb is economy. This may be true, but it is possible higher watt bulbs may overload the building circuitry. If the building's circuitry is old or improperly maintained, the result can be overheated wires and a fire. (People who use hair dryers in hotels where it asks you not to use them are playing the same, potentially deadly, game.)

Christmas Island, Part II

There are actually two Christmas Islands. Last month we explored Christmas Island in the Pacific atoll nation of Kiribati. This month we'll look at the other Christmas Island, located in the Indian Ocean south of Indonesia.

Christmas Island is an Australian territory, with English being the primary language. The island is small and sparsely populated, with approximately 2,000 residents. There are nice beaches, most accessible by only four wheel drive vehicles, excellent reefs, and tropical rainforests. The only industry on the island was sporadic phosphate mining until recently, when it was decided to pursue that other industry that all islands with limited resources eventually pursue: tourism.

Christmas Island still remains off the beaten track, but a new five star casino resort built to attract Singaporians and others from nearby nations will help change that. Good snorkeling and scuba diving attracts humans. Tourists also are discovering the annual November crab migration, when the island is almost covered with crustaceans making their way from the rain forests to the sea. Viewing this natural phenomenon becomes more popular every year, so go before the humans outnumber the crabs.

There are few websites on Australian Christmas Island. The best is:
